Houseman’s Phoenix Theater and was a director on Broadway. In the late 1930s he traveled widely in the deep south and the west, collecting folklore for the Library of Congress. He produced a thrice-weekly radio show for CBS featuring folk singers like Woody Guthrie, Burl Ives, Leadbelly, and young Pete Seeger. He contributed regularly to the Communist Party paper, the Daily Worker. He never disowned or fully abandoned his left-wing activism, but the McCarthy witch hunters never went after him and he was never blacklisted, probably because Howard Hughes liked him.

BURNETT GUFFY (26 May 1905, Del Rio, Tennessee—30 May 1983, Goleta, California) began in film as an assistant cameraman in 1923, then became a camera operator (John Ford’s The Informer, Alfred Hitchcock’s Foreign Correspondent among others) and became a director of photography in 1944. He was d.p. on nearly 90 films, and won best cinematographer Oscars for two of them—From Here to Eternity 1953 and Bonnie and Clyde 1967 and nominations for three others: King Rat 1965, Birdman of Alcatraz 1962, and The Harder They Fall 1956. Some of his other films are The Stiegler 1971, The Great White Hope 1970, The Learning Tree 1969, How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying 1967, All the King’s Men 1949, Knock on Any Door 1949, and Soul of a Monster 1944.

HUMPHREY BOGART (25 December 1899, New York, New York—14 January 1957, Los Angeles, California, throat cancer) was best known for playing tough guys and hard cases, but he didn’t start out that way. His father was a surgeon, his mother a magazine illustrator, and he went to Trinity School in Manhattan and Phillips Academy in Andover. It’s hard to tell which “facts” about Bogart’s life are true, which are folklore and which are studio hype; there’s a web site devoted to the subject: http://www.macconsultant.com/bogart/legends.html. After several years of minor stage and film roles, he got his breakthrough part as the gangster Duke Mantee in The Petrified Forest (1935), a role he’d played on Broadway. The studio wanted to give the part to Edward G. Robinson, maybe America’s most famous snarly gangster because of his part as the gangster Duke Mantee in Caesar they’d played in on Broadway. (Bogart later named one of his children Leslie.) Lauren Bacall was 19 years old when she co-starred with Bogart in John Huston’s To Have and Have Not 1944. Her famous line from the film was: “You know you don’t have to act with me, Steve. You don’t have to say anything, you don’t have to do anything. Not a thing. Oh, maybe just whistle. You know how to whistle, don’t you? You just put your lips together and [beat] b low.” Bogie’s co-star contains a small, gold whistle, which Bacall put there. You never know. His longtime friend and 7-time director John Huston said of him, “The trouble with Bogart is he thinks he’s Bogart.” Huston also said, “Himself, he never took too seriously - his work, most seriously. He regarded the somewhat gaudy figure of Bogart the star with amused cynicism; Bogart the actor he held in deep respect.” He died in his sleep after surgery for throat cancer. His last words are supposed to have been, “I sho uld never have switched from scotch to martinis.” George Raft was as important to Bogart’s film...

Gloria Graham (Gloria Hallward, 28 November 1923, Los Angeles, California—5 October 1981, New York, New York, cancer with peritonitis) was the daughter of architect Michael Hallward and stage actress Jean Grahame. Her first film was the lead in Blonde Fever 1944, but it was her performance as the temptress in It’s a Wonderful Life two years later that made her a star. Two of her four marriages were in the same family: Nicholas Ray from 1948-1952, and his son from a previous marriage, Tony, 1960-1976. Leonard Maltin writes: “Sulky, seductive blond actress who was one of Hollywood’s top temptresses: She played more shadily women (and outright tramps) than any other female performer on-screen during the late 1940s and 1950s. Even when she portrayed good girls, Graham often layered her characterizations with a sympathetic traits.” She won a best actress Oscar for The Bad and the Beautiful 1952 and had a nomination for Crossfire 1947. Some of her other films: Melvin and Howard 1980, Odds Against Tomorrow 1959, Oklahoma! 1955, Macao 1952, and The Greatest Show on Earth 1952.

Frank Lovejoy (28 March 1914, The Bronx, New York—2 October 1962, New York, New York, heart attack) was, according to Leonard Maltin, a “roughshewn, taciturn supporting player and occasional lead man who came to the screen in the late 1940s after acting on the stage and in dramatic radio for many years. A dependable player singularly lacking in charisma, Lovejoy was effective in Everyman roles and played his share of an luckly slobs caught up in intrigues not of their own making. He also played several dodgily soldiers in WW2 stories. Lovejoy, a good private-eye type, played detectives in the TV series “Man Against Crime” (1956) and “Meet McGraw” (1957-58).” He was in about 40 films, but he’s probably best know for I Was a Communist for the FBI 1951.

Godard’s magisterial statement, “the cinema is Nicholas Ray,” has come in for a good deal of ridicule, not by any means entirely undeserved. Yet it contains a core of truth, especially if taken in reverse. Nicholas Ray is cinema in the sense that his films work entirely (and perhaps only) as movies, arrangements of space and movement charged with dramatic tension. Few direct statements more clearly that a film is something beyond the sum of its parts. Consider only the more literary components—dialogue, plot, characterization—and a film like Party Girl is patently trash. But on the screen the visual turbulence of Ray’s shooting style, the fractured intensity of his editing, fuse the elements into a valid emotional whole. The flaws are still apparent, but they become incidential.

Ray’s grounding in architecture (he studied at Taliesin with Frank Lloyd Wright) reveals itself in an exceptionally acute sense of space, often deployed as an extension of states of mind. In his films the geography of locations, and especially interiors, serves as a psychological terrain. Conflict can be played out, and tensions expressed, in terms of spatial areas (upstairs and downstairs, for example, or the courtyards and levels of an apartment complex) pitted against each other. Ray also credited Wright with instilling in him “a love of the horizontal line”–and hence of contemporaries, who found it awkward and inhibiting, Ray avidly explores the geometric enclosures. “Ray drew from both Bogart and Grahame performances of lyrical movement, at other times angling his camera to create urgent diagonals, suggesting character strains at the constrictions of the frame.

Nearly all Ray’s finest films were made in the 1950s, their agonized romanticism cutting across the grain of that decade’s brittle optimism. “The poet of American disenchantment” (in David Thomson’s phrase), Ray viewed social conventions as a trap, from which violence or madness may be the only escape. . . . In A Lonely Place subverts Bogart’s tough-guy persona, revealing the anguish and insecurity that underlie it and, as V.S. Perkins puts it, making “violence the index of the character’s weak ness rather than strength.”

“I’m a stranger here myself.” Ray often quoted Sterling Hayden’s line from Johnny Guitar as his personal motto. His career, as he himself was well aware, disconcertingly mirrored the fate of his own, riven, alienated heroes. Unappreciated (or so he felt) in America, he nonetheless produced all his best work there. In Europe, where he was hailed as one of the world’s greatest directors, his craft deserted him: after two ill-starred epics, the last sixteen years of his life trickled away in a mess of incoherent footage and abortive projects. Victim of his own legend, Ray finally took self-identification with his protagonists to its ultimate conclusion—collaborating in Lightning Over Water, in the filming of his own disintegration and death.

The second of his two Santas [Bogart’s company] movies was another matter altogether, one of the darkest of all Hollywood-on-Hollywood films, unraveled even by the romantic cynicism of Sunset Boulevard. In a Lonely Place (1950) casts Bogart as an alcoholic screenwriter, quivering with barely suppressed violence, who comes under suspicion of murder. The evidence of his neighbor (Gloria Graham) clearly nears him, and they start an affair. But as his psychopathic nature begins to show, she begins to doubt his innocence. By the time the real killer is found, the tension between them has destroyed their relationship, and with it his hope of redemption.

The 1950s were certainly Ray’s finest period, in which his films were world-famous for their potential, sometimes combining it with laterally tracking shots to convey the format’s potential, exceptioonal depth and conviction; Victor Perkins remark: “In a lonely place the first of them, set the subsequent pattern. David Thoms then considered it “the most cutting across the grain of that decade’s brittle optimism. “The poet of American disenchantment” (in David Thomson’s phrase), Ray viewed social conventions as a trap, from which violence or madness may be the only escape. . . . In A Lonely Place subverts Bogart’s tough-guy persona, revealing the anguish and insecurity that underlie it and, as V.S. Perkins puts it, making “violence the index of the character’s weak ness rather than strength.”

Much of the film’s visual power rests on Ray’s mastery of the CinemaScope screen. It was his first picture in wide screen [and would have been the first ever in monochrome, had the CinemaScope company not objected], a ratio that he welcomed for its expressive potential and used in almost all his subsequent films. “What Welles was to deep focus, Ray was to CinemaScope,” maintained Robin Wood.

Ray: “I never think of any film as a message film. I never think of a film as doing anything except providing a heightened sense of being.”

In 1969 Ray returned to the United States and began work on a film about the Chicago Conspiracy trial, to feature the defendants as themselves, with Groucho Marx as Judge Julius Hoffman. . . . After some 30,000 feet had been shot, the backers (who included Hugh Hefner) pulled out, and Ray suffered an embolism which destroyed his right eye.
“It was never all in the script. If it were, why make the movie?” Ray’s oft-quoted comment holds good for any worthwhile film, but perhaps applies with special relevance to his own work. Dull scripts. Routine plots, inept casting—could—sometimes, if not always—be transmuted, through “the extraordinary resonances with which a director can provoke by his use of actors, decor, movement, colour, shape, of all that can be seen and heard” (Victor Perkins), into richly vivid segments of his own restless exploratory cinema. Ray has been both overpraised and overdenigrated. His output is uneven, and none of his films is without flaws; but the dramatic urgency and dynamic visual flair of his best work transcends all imperfections.

FROM FILM NOIR: AN ENCYCLOPEDIC REFERENCE TO THE AMERICAN STYLE, ED. BY ALAIN SILVER & ELIZABETH WARD:

With the Western, film noir shares the distinction of being an indigenous American form. Unlike Westerns, noir films have no precise antecedents either in terms of a well-defined literary genre or a period in American history. As a result, what might be termed the noir cycle has a singular position in the brief history of American motion pictures: a body of films that not only presents a cohesive vision of America but that does so in a manner transcending the influences of auteurism or genre. Film noir is grounded neither in personal creation nor in translation of another tradition into film form. Rather it is a self-contained reflection of American cultural preoccupations in film form. In short, it is the unique example of a wholly American film style.

That may seem a substantial claim to make for a group of films whose plots frequently turn on deadly violence or sexual obsession, whose characters include numbers of down-and-out private eyes, desperate women, and petty criminals. Nor does the viewer unease felt by a viewer who watches a shadowy form move across a lonely street or who hears the sound of car tires creeping over wet asphalt automatically translate into sociological assertions about paranoia or postwar guilt. At the same time, it is clear that the emergence of film noir coincides with these other popular sentiments at large in America. “Film noir” is literally “black film,” not just in the sense of being full of physically dark images, nor of reflecting a dark mood in American society, but equally, almost empirically, as a black slate on which the culture could inscribe its ills and in the process produce a catharsis to help relieve them.

Tim Dirks on film noir (http://www.filmsite.org/filmnoir.html):
The primary moods of classic film noir are melancholy, alienation, bleakness, disillusionment, disenchantment, pessimism, ambiguity, moral corruption, evil, guilt and paranoia. Heroes (or anti-heroes), corrupt characters and villains include down-and-out, hard-boiled detectives or private eyes, cops, gangsters, government agents, crooks, war veterans, petty criminals, and murderers. These protagonists are often low-life characters from the dark and gloomy underworld of violence and corruption. Distinctively, they are cynical, tamished, obsessive (sexual or otherwise), brooding, menacing, sinister, sardonic, disillusioned, frightened and insecure knaves, struggling to survive and ultimately losing. The females in film noir are either of two types - dutiful, reliable, trustworthy and loving women; or femmes fatales - duplicitous, double-crossing, gorgeous, unkind, predatory, tough-sweet, unreliable, irresponsible, manipulative and desperate women. Film noir films...show the dark and inhuman side of human nature with cynicism and doomed love, and they emphasize the brutal, unhealthy, seamy, shadowy, dark and sadistic side of the human experience. Film noir is marked by expressionistic lighting...disorienting visual schemes, circling cigarette smoke, existential sensibilities, and unbalanced compositions. Settings are often interiors with low-key lighting, Venetian-blind ed window s, and dark and gloomy appearances. Exteriors are often night scenes with deep shadows, wet asphalt, rain-slicked or mean streets, flashing neon lights, and low key lighting. Story locations are often in murky and dark streets, dimly-lit apartments and hotel rooms of big cities. An atmosphere of menace, pessimism, anxiety, suspicion that anything can go wrong, dingy realism, fatalism, defeat and entrapment are stylized characteristics of film noir. Narratives are frequently complex and convoluted, typically with flashbacks (or a series of flashbacks) and/or reflective voice-over narration.

Some other FNs:

The basic film noir reference book is Alan Silver and Elizabeth Ward, eds., Film Noir: An Encyclopedic Reference to the American Style, 3rd ed., 1992. And there are a bunch of good essays in Alan Silver and James Uminski, eds., Film Noir Reader 5th ed., & Film Noir Reader 2, both Limelight, NY 1999. Fiona A. Viella, editor of the excellent online film journal Sense of Cinema, has a very smart piece about In a Lonely Place online at http://www.senseofcinema.com/contents/00/10/lonely.html

Join us next week for another superb movie: the film that gave postmodernism its single compelling idea, Toshiro Mifune in Akira Kurosawa’s classic Rashomon.

And, should you want to get out of the house in the interim, which you should, the place to go in Buffalo is the Albright-Knox Art Gallery, where there’s an exhibit of photos from the New York Times and more, including a Harley-Dav Dimension comic and some occasional books that will make your head swim......for more info on all that’s going on there, visit http://csac.buffalo.edu/theiftives. Robert Creeley is giving a poetry reading at the Gallery Wednesday night at 7:30 with a book signing afterwards, and then there’s a series of five Thursday night films hosted by Bruce Jackson.

Feb 14 Fred McLeod Wilcox, Forbidden Planet 1956, Feb 21 Elia Kazan, A Streetcar Named Desire 1951, Feb 28 Stanley Kubrick, The Killing 1956, March 7 E mile de Antonio, Point of Order 1964, March 14 Gene Kelly and Stanley Donen, Singin’ in the Rain 1952 (Free admission; parking $2. All hi-res DVD projection except Point of Order, which is available only in video. The Garden Restaurant will be open for dinner on screening nights. Call 716.270.8233 for information and reservations)

Email Diane engdc@acsu.buffalo.edu email Bruce bjackson@buffalo.edu